Episode 26: House Rules: Your Questions Answered

I'm Myquillyn Smith and this is House Rules.
Welcome to Episode 26.

If you are listening to this episode right when it drops—first of all thank you. And that means that the book that shares the name of this podcast, House Rules, just released into the world a few days ago.

I have loved seeing so many of you share that you received your copy.

I really hope this book is your go to for home encouragement and confidence to make better decorating decisions.

House rules will help you figure out why some things look amazing and other things, well, not so much, and I hope it will help you know what to do to fix it.

This week instead of a normal episode I'm going to point you to something else to listen to. I hope that's ok.

Actually it's more like choosing your own adventure.

Over the past four months, I've had about 12 days blocked off on my calendar where I got to have conversations with some incredibly talented and fun fellow podcasters. These conversations were excellent and fun and surprising and they asked all the questions you might be wondering about home, hosting, decorating, perfection, and the House Rules.

Today, I'm inviting you to scroll down to the show notes and click the link to a list of all the podcasts I've had the pleasure to join over the past few months. Most of those episodes are going live this week and many will still be dropping over the next week or so. There will be 40 or 50 for you by the time we're all done.

I encourage you to scroll through the topics and pick one or two episodes to listen to that sounds like what you need to hear, hosted by people you enjoy. I especially love the episode I got to record with my baby sister, Emily P. Freeman, the host of The Next Right Thing Podcast. Thanks for clicking a few extra times this week.

And special thanks to Karrie and Kelli for organizing this and thank you to each podcaster who trusted me to share a few minutes with your audience.

I'll see you there.
